Adobe PDF support has been improved, including the ability to unlock all passwords for grouped-items. You can also password-protect individual pages and notes within PDF documents. This is great for sharing ideas or working on your next design task without worrying about someone downloading the document and breaching your intellectual property. The new artwork import feature means you can pipe your Photoshop file into the Behance studio and apply the artwork with one click. Or perhaps you can provide a PDF with artwork already applied. If you don't have a Behance account, you can still use the feature, but it will likely lead to a bit of application of your work. One other note: the Apply artwork function now recognizes layers in both the original PSD and the imported artwork and applies them accordingly. So, if you have a logo and want to apply it, and you have one layer of solid color in the original PSD, you can apply the layer in the artwork that defines the logo. That's one less thing you need to remember or worry about. The Curvature Presets do some cool stuff, including being able to straighten objects like a sphere, irregularly shaped ball, a checkerboard, cylindrical curve, or any other shape. Great when you have a blob of murky red that you want to extend in some interesting ways. There are two new in-place eraser tools: one for filling an existing shape and the other for smoothing. Both allow for a greater level of control over the targeted area. It's understandable why Adobe put these in-place erasers, because shapes can be a bit tricky to fill. It's so easy to accidentally remove a shape, resulting in a loss of content. With the in-place erasers, you can simply click and drag around a section of you photo and fill the area as needed.
