With two title cards at the beginning of the hand-delivered photo files before the editing can begin, the basic function of the program is displayed. Once you click the Edit button, you get a new page with text that displays the image's name, camera information, adjustments, and estimated time. The Save As... function allows you to save a different file type from the original file and with different destinations. This way you are able to have the final edited file in different places. There are other features as well. For instance, the Import feature allows you to decide which photos you want to process without the need to organize images or preview them. You can also use this feature to import videos and types of files that include Adobe Photoshop Express, Adobe Photoshop Touch, Photoshop Elements, and some other types. The Export feature allows you to upload your photos and videos to your Creative Cloud account. Except for Create a New Collection, there are other photo editing options, such as New Layer to Copy, New Layer to Group, and New Layer to Paste. You are able to add or subtract layers from a photo. The Prisma-likes options allow you to whiten colors, remove tones, add shadows and highlights, etc. The newly added Fill... feature also adds some new effects to the one included since Lightroom 4.50. These options include Edges, Text, Blur, Sharpen, and Refine, which are now more useful for adding the different aspects to the image. That's an interesting observation. Have to think about that. I've been using my Hasselblad with the Shimpo for about 5 years, so I imagine that this is a new field of experience for me. Even under the most optimal conditions, with a perfectly adjusted white balance and exposures, you will get a distinction in results; it's the visual differences.
