In particular, this invention relates to a magnetically operable bi-metal switch that includes a pair of electrical contacts connected through an arcing path defined between a pair of pivoting members and separated by a given distance by a pair of spacer discs. 2. Description of the Prior Art In particular, this invention relates to a bi-metal switch that is operative to make or break an electrical connection between a pair of electrical contacts depending on the magnetic flux density of a magnet through a magnetically permeable bi-metal strip, an armature strip and a yoke strip, for example. The bi-metal switch that includes a pair of electrical contacts which are connected through an arc path defined between a pair of pivoting members and separated by a given distance by a pair of spacer discs is known. The known bi-metal switch operates satisfactorily as is well known in the art. However, it is found that, over time the known bi-metal switch may be rendered inoperative due to, for example, the breakdown of the electrical connection between the pair of electrical contacts. Further, the known bi-metal switch requires a certain minimum actuating force to achieve good contact between the pair of electrical contacts when in the closed position. In order to avoid the inconvenience of reworking a faulty bi-metal switch, a knock-out tool has been provided. This is a tool that is used to produce a de-coupling action between the pair of pivoting members and spacer discs such that the switch can be repaired in place. Since the switch is disposed in an engine compartment that may be relatively crowded, it is important that any knock-out tool be able to be mounted to the switch in a manner that will ensure that it is securely held in place.
