I'm sending some data from device A to device B using UDP. The packet format is something like this: V1 | V2 | (unused, like maybe padding) | timestamp of device A (16 bits) | timestamp of device B (16 bits) | unused I send the packet to device B with a time_wait of 5 seconds, and then I wait about 5 seconds on my device B. Finally, I send the packet to device A again. I'm pretty sure that both devices A and B are running on the same machine. A's time is set to the correct value, and B's time is also correct as far as I can tell. In the code I use to send the data, I send the data as follows: int timestamp1 = atoi(); int timestamp2 = atoi(); packet->v1 = 0xFF; packet->v2 = 0xFF; packet->timestamp1 = timestamp1; packet->timestamp2 = timestamp2; But here, the time of device A is the value of timestamp1, and the time of device B is the value of timestamp2. Even though both devices are in the same physical location, they do not have the same time (of course this is a possible explanation, but not a likely one). So I'm assuming that the time is set on my server and the time is not the same in both devices. How can
