The effect of low-dose intravenous gamma-globulin on macrophage-induced T lymphocyte suppression in vitro. The complement-activating and cell-surface IgE-mediated immune responses both are important for the development of anaphylaxis. This study was undertaken to test the hypothesis that intravenous administration of low-dose intravenous gamma-globulin (IgG) modulates macrophage-induced T lymphocyte suppression in a murine model of anaphylaxis. Spleens from BALB/c mice were obtained, and CD4+ T cells were selected by magnetic cell separation. The macrophages were cultured with IgG (1.0 mg/ml) and lipopolysaccharide (LPS) (1.0 microgram/ml) to test the effect of IgG on macrophage-induced T lymphocyte suppression. T lymphocytes were isolated from the spleen of mice sensitized with anti-dinitrophenyl IgE antibodies and cultured with macrophages plus IgG. The phorbol ester, phorbol myristate acetate (PMA) (1.0 micrograms/ml) was used as a positive control. PHA-M (5.0 micrograms/ml) was used as a negative control. Purified IgG was obtained by gel filtration chromatography. The results showed that macrophage-induced T lymphocyte suppression was not changed by IgG in normal spleen cells. However, IgG reversed the T lymphocyte suppression by macrophages induced with LPS. A dose-response curve showed that a concentration of 1.0 mg/ml IgG may modulate macrophage-induced T lymphocyte suppression in a murine model of anaphylaxis. The reversal of T lymphocyte suppression suggests that intravenous administration of low-dose intravenous gamma-globulin (IgG) may modulate the macrophage-induced immune response.
