SMC (Simulated Melanoid Cocktail), also known as melanoidins, are a large class of compounds resulting from the Maillard browning of carbohydrates. They are abundant in nature, and mostly produced by enzymatic reactions in which sugars and amino acids react with one another through dehydration and condensation. SMC's are formed by Maillard reactions, much as in the case of caramelization. The reactions are initiated by the adsorption of an amino-acid residue onto a carbohydrate backbone by non-covalent interactions. The SMC is able to be produced with a range of activation temperatures and reaction times. In general terms, the rate of the reaction is much faster when the amino acid and carbohydrate molecules have close contact, allowing for much more complex reaction pathways and products. SMC molecules have been investigated for their diversity and biotechnological uses. They have been shown to have antioxidant properties and have been patented for use as anti-cancer agents. Its monomers derived from amino acids have also been used in vaccinations and chemotherapy. General reaction pathway: Glucose + Tripeptide + Alpha-dicarbonyl (Pyrroles) → Melanoidins (SMC) + Taurine + Sugar (Fructose) References Lecoq, M.; Thoreau, H.; Maugeri, C.; Buscemi, D.; Vigna, S.; Ghisoni, G.; De Boecke, P.; Pirrone, M.
