This all combined, means the game features a never-before-seen level of realism, accuracy and dynamic play. "This was a complicated development task," said Seamus Blackley, FIFA producer at EA Canada. "We knew that an all-encompassing demo of the game wasn't a feasible task, but we needed to capture the feel of a high-intensity football match. "The feedback we've received since the FIFA 20 tournament is fantastic. The game isn't quite as deep as we'd like it to be, but fans are looking forward to trying it in person to see for themselves and experiencing the added realism." HyperMotion Technology is the first in-game technology to be used in a FIFA title. It was developed to simulate the movement and reaction of players as a 3D model. Although, the technology is never actually rendered - it's calculated in real-time during gameplay. HyperMotion Technology will be available via FIFA Authentic Player Motion, a new feature that gathers motion capture data from real players and transforms them into a 3D model to be used in single-player and online modes in FIFA 22. FIFA Authentic Player Motion will be available free to all players for a limited period of time, starting today. FIFA Authentic Player Motion (APM) will be available for the following games modes: Story Mode MyPLAYER Mode MyClub Mode FIFA Online 3 FIFA Ultimate Team FIFA Mobile FIFA Stories FIFA Championship and FIFA Ultimate Team Club Manager The feature will be available as part of the latest update to the FIFA title via the in-game menu. Players who already have APM enabled can continue to play like normal. Watching football videos on YouTube is how many of us started playing the game of soccer - a simple and fun way to get into a sport, but it was only the first step. We want to see more people playing the game, both as a fan of the sport and a player. Bringing the feel of the sport to the living room, there is no game better than FIFA to bridge that gap. We want people to be able to experience the game as a player - getting into the heat of the action. Our professional teams and their athletes have worked very hard to balance all aspects of gameplay.
