Nepal has recently had three attempts at political, economic and social transition in the last 25 years. People's desire for peace has been reflected in the continuing peace process. However, the Nepali political system has not changed its structure since the immediate aftermath of the Third Round Table Conference in 1991. The same political parties, Janadhikar Forum, has been in power since then. It is a multi-party democracy of the Nepali Congress. The policy issues that have been captured by the political parties in the country have not been reflected in the implementation of public health policy-making process to deal with the current problems in the health care system and governance model that has existed since the earliest political meetings in the early 1950s. Nepal's past health experiences and policy implementation reflect the need to revise the current health policy-making process to deal with the current problems in the health sector. This has led to inequalities in access and use of health services. There is inadequate coordination between the two sectors. Current health policy and planning are not based on comprehensive assessments of the situation and the probable future. The health policy development processes of the past have not included the views of all stakeholders. A recent institutional review of health policy in Nepal showed that there has been limited capacity of the health sector to plan strategically. In this contex
