Richard Harris grew up in Vermont playing saxophone with his high school jazz band. He taught himself to play the saxophone at the early age of 9. His interest in music led him to explore the music industry while attending Dartmouth University. He then attended Berklee College of Music in Boston and developed a career as a music teacher at the same time. Join Professor Harris as he explores the study of music as he discusses the important questions of the greatest musical composers. Give Richard a follow on twitter @ProfRichardH and check out his teaching videos on YouTube. I want it to wait until all the asynchronous methods (e.g. sending mail) are complete before being executed. Is there a way to do it using the webpack devtool (--webpack-watch)? A: I'm not sure if there's a way to do it using the webpack devtool, but you could just move your application.js script outside of the webpack process. Worst-case scenario, you'd just execute it right after everything's done and whatever you need to do with it. A: To add to the answer by @maikew so you don't have to move your script and to make your script better. Here is a new suggestion: A new Webpack 4 feature is named dynamic import() You can use it to load some library into your bundle like the Moment library. To import the library: import { formatMoment } from "moment"; To use the function: moment().format(); //format() is from Moment library You can export the function with export default formatMoment; And then use it in your other js files: import formatMoment from 'path/to/your/library.js'; moment f988f36e3a
