when you finish, save the new terrain in the file system and go to your geodatabase to see it. it is also possible to save this directly to postgis with the st_transform function, if you have the postgis extension installed on the server. this is not necessary, though, as any model you make can be viewed using the sql client. you can use this feature to create an instant terrain for your database, so the ground you see while browsing your database is actually created by the quick terrain modeler. the only difference is that the quick terrain modeler can generate a more advanced terrain. and in addition, you can also generate instant terrain for the quick terrain modeler. this may be more useful if you have terrain in your database, but it is not a terrain you would like to show on the map. the terrain created by the quick terrain modeler looks more realistic than the terrain in the database. for this, you can also save the result in your geodatabase, or you can use the postgis function as well. if you load a terrain created using the quick terrain modeler, you will notice it has a watermark. this is because you have changed the water level in the quick terrain modeler. you should be able to change this watermark by deleting the water level you set up. if you do not delete it, the quick terrain modeler will overwrite the values you set for the water level. the quick terrain modeler is not a full terrain generator. it is a model, which means you can modify the terrain, to add more layers, remove layers, break up the terrain, etc. the quick terrain modeler uses the topography to generate a terrain, so the shapes of the terrain are not defined by a file. this means you can load the quick terrain modeler and use the terrain as it is.
