Raees.A comparison of the effects of in vitro lipid exposures on the membrane potential and survival of normal and malignant human breast cells. A comparison of the effects of in vitro lipid exposures on the membrane potential and survival of normal human breast epithelial cells (HBEC) and mammary carcinoma cells was conducted to determine whether these are similar or different. Following 72 h of exposure to linoleic acid, arachidonic acid, and liposomes containing ceramide, there were significant differences between HBEC and malignant cells with respect to changes in both the membrane potential and cell survival. Different responses with respect to membrane potential were found between normal and malignant cells with respect to different fatty acids, ions, and polyunsaturated fatty acids. The effect of the following constituents was investigated: 1) arachidonic acid versus linoleic acid, 2) linoleic acid versus oleic acid, and 3) basic phospholipids (phosphatidylcholine, phosphatidylethanolamine, and phosphatidylserine) and acidic phospholipids (phosphatidylinositol and phosphatidylserine). These studies indicate that the effect of monounsaturated fatty acids is not significantly different from that of polyunsaturated fatty acids, whereas the dilaitype of the acyl chain influences the effect of the fatty acids on the membrane potential of malignant cells. In addition, compounds previously proposed as possible inducers of cell death are tested for their ability to affect the survival of mammary carcinoma cells. These results indicate that there is no direct relationship between membrane potential
