Hi Scar And Ancient Injury, Thanks for registering your question with us. It is important that your doctor can give you a diagnosis and prescribe the best treatment for your problem. A scar that is raised, ugly or painful can be caused by a burn or other injury, but if you don't remember when the injury occurred, or the symptoms have not appeared in a long time, it could be a problem with your skin. Your doctor can perform a skin test or physical examination to find out more. It is possible that some sort of surgery was performed in a hospital or clinic a long time ago. It could be a surgical scar, but this is unlikely to be the reason for your problems. It is more likely to be a hernia, or a rash or patch of infected skin. Thanks for your comment. Gameplay is basically like this. Once you get some basic idea of how the game works, you should be fine and good to go. (Go check the tips section for a complete walkthrough)PLEASE BE AWARE that this game might be quite addictive, as it is not easy to get through all the levels. You can turn the "Hardcore" difficulty setting down to "normal" in the options menu. You can also change the speed in which certain actions happen. To access the options menu, tap on the screen. You can also play alone.Please don't expect to get through the game on the first try, you will need to revisit areas more than once to get them all. Good luck! Iterative Stochastic Classification Trees by Bayesian Estimation Abstract A short summary of the theoretical foundations is presented first, as this introduction spans rather different disciplines than the rest of the paper. Second, a not-so-standard Bayesian approach to gradient-boosting, based on a Bayesian inverse-function approximation, is given. Third, compared to other Bayesian tree methods, this bayesian approach notably requires less strong mixing assumptions, and hence provides a more natural alternative to other more standard tree inference. Fourth, a new sampler for INTLOWP trees (thus INTLOWP trees can also be coded using other languages than R) is given. This sampler offers a Bayesian extension of a stochastic search procedure from learning theory. Finally, the proposed new method, based on INTLOWP trees and the Bayesian inverse-function approximation approach, is tested on two examples. Introduction Classification and regression trees (CART) are a fundamental statistical technique aimed at dealing with high-dimensional and small sample problems. To be precise, CARTs decompose high-dimensional training data into pieces having low dimension (typically three or less), which may be then understood as a decision tree. Such trees have the following properties: (a) A node is a high-dimensional vector that splits the training set into two homogeneous components. (b) More than one node can exist per training vector. (c) Cut points in tree models are binary. (d) No regularity assumptions are made on the features of the data. Figure 1 shows an example of a regression tree for an example with four dimensions. Considering the sufficient tree property [1] (see section 2.3 for details) together with the L1-risk consistency [2] (see also section 2.4) of the CART algorithm provide a strong theoretical foundation for such methodologies. However, in practice, the use of the CART algorithm suffers from two drawbacks. First, the CART algorithm is an exhaustive optimization procedure, and may be time-consuming on some problems. Secondly, the CART algorithm does not guarantee any form of consistency error bound of the learned tree model, and the reliance on model selection inherent to the CART model may indeed be problematic on difficult regression problems. As a possible remedy, CART trees have been recently augmented by boosting approaches [3, 4] that provide direct model training based on a search for 'local maximum'.

Hivemind is an atmospheric third-person indie game, taking place in a procedurally generated post-apocalyptic world. Explore an immersive and beautiful environment, scavenge supplies, and survive in a harsh but lively post-apocalyptic world. Features: Innate sense of freedom Procedurally generated world that's open and diverse. Seamless mix between survival and open world game. Dynamic world, player survival based on balance between hunger, thirst, fatigue, cold, and heat. Procedurally generated weapon types, powered by a bow with a floaty projectile or your bare fists. Crafting system – use items or materials collected and found in the world Hivemind is an open-ended puzzle game that pits the player against a post-apocalyptic world, where player survival depends on their ability to navigate a world filled with bandit threats, mutant creatures and a constant need to find food and water to stay alive. Set in a young and primitive time where humans have just barely begun to surpass the other animals on the planet, players take control of a band of humans that scavenge the Earth and bring back all of the natural resources that they can gather, which then allows them to craft weapons. The weapons and ammunition that they get back can then be used to fight and protect themselves from the feral beasts that roam the land. Players will need to create a strategy based on the materials that they get and what they want to do in the world. Players can use the weapon system to fight, defend, or hunt for resources that they need to craft more useful gear or create ammunition. Players can plan ahead and construct a network of defenses to protect their holdings, and can use the bow to defend their settlement. Features An atmospheric, survival horror game with a meditative match of skill and reflex Beautiful and empowering narrative. A branching storyline with different endings, characters and events. Comprehensive in-game help system with all aspects of gameplay explained. Features Innate sense of freedom Procedurally generated world that's open and diverse. Seamless mix between survival and open world game. Dynamic world, player survival based on balance between hunger, thirst, fatigue, cold, and heat. Eradicate all known perversions of nature, starting with the humans. Procedurally generated weapon types
