I know in the US the majority of retailers use 20% ammonia solution for flow through, but is it common in the UK or Australia for the majority of retailers to use 50% or 100% ammonia solution for your tank? If I happen to order an aquarium from a good online retailer that sells Australia, where do you recommend they ship the tank from? At this time, 40% is very common in the UK but I think even 50% is not unusual. Ammonia has a very low odour or smell so fish don't notice it. 90% is uncommon and above that, up to 100% isn't very common. In fact, there are even some videos on youtube of people in the UK doing 100% ammonia flow. I have had a tank running for over a year at 50% ammonia. You can find it cheaper on the internet. Most of the stuff bought online is mostly profit margin. It doesn't cost much to run 100% and you can buy it around the £2 mark, if not less. The retailer I have bought from did say the main issue is a build up of ammonia, so a cycle should solve the problem.

The first nationwide study of medical school faculty active in the field of addiction has found that knowledge of substance abuse is not evenly distributed among academic medicine physicians, with levels of training and even prestige seeming to play a role in the overall attitudes of faculty. The study, which surveyed academic physicians over the age of 25 from 23 medical schools, revealed a wide range of attitudes toward the subject, even among highly trained faculty members. The sample, which was drawn from the Group on Evaluation of Education and Culture survey of the American College of Physicians, includes 29% faculty who specialize in addiction and 29% faculty who are certified addiction specialists. We asked all members to whom we showed the questionnaire whether they considered themselves to be active in substance abuse research or not, whether they were willing to do so and what they thought the value of their work might be. Not surprisingly, participants who were not certified addiction specialists were less likely to have a background in research or even be interested in doing so. Among active addiction specialists, however, none of the prestige-related factors studied were associated with increased likelihood of having a research background or activity in addiction. Furthermore, participants who were not certified specialists were much more likely than active specialists to report attitudes and behaviors -- and even to believe that their colleagues shared these attitudes and behaviors. There are important implications for academia and primary care physicians who care for patients with addiction, ranging from the potential for professional stereotyping to gaps in access to knowledge and training. In our view, the survey data suggest that academic medicine physicians can
