The suit, filed Tuesday, alleges the federal government has too lax a standard for runoff pollution in waterways, which scientists say is wreaking havoc on natural ecosystems. The government's policy, the suit argues, encourages runoff pollution, which the groups contend causes harm to aquatic life by enhancing the growth of harmful organisms. The suit also challenges the standard's failure to consider the human health effects of persistent toxic chemicals. "This suit shines a light on the flaws in the [Pollution Discharge Elimination System] (PDF) that is responsible for the ongoing and predictable loss of rivers, streams and wetlands," said Gary Ruskin, vice-president of the firm Our Children's Trust, one of the groups suing the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency. The groups are asking the court to direct EPA to make updates to the rule, which sets national standards for controlling pollutants flowing into waterways. The suit also asks the court to rule 6d1f23a050
