I have also used generics like so:

```
class Translator { private int someValue; Translator(int someValue) { this.someValue = someValue; } public void myMethod() { doSomething(); doSomethingElse(); } } class Translator implements XmlHandler { @Override public void handle(XmlHttpResponse xml) { String s = xml.getString(); // Do something... } }
```
