better wound care outcomes. As more Americans are reliant upon themselves or others for the costs of healthcare, there is a corresponding need for improved access to healthcare and for increased focus upon quality. Healthcare in the United States is expensive and often not as effective as in other developed nations. Although there are many factors influencing the quality of healthcare, one of the most critical barriers is the financial burden on patients, particularly those of low socioeconomic status, in having adequate access to and obtaining the proper care needed. Patients pay most of the costs of their healthcare directly through insurance or out of pocket, and as a result may not be able to afford the care they need. This results in lost income and lost productivity for the worker and reduced efficiency and expenditures for the healthcare system. Federal and state government subsidies and other programs have been instituted to address the problem of inadequate coverage, but insurance is still not universal in the United States. The Affordable Care Act addresses the problem of insurance coverage for most Americans, providing a starting point for health reform. Medicare, the Federal government's health insurance program for seniors, is expanding and covering more people.
