Combination of the molluscan drugs dexamethasone and inotekine: side effects and immunological alterations. The immunomodulatory potential of molluscan drugs was tested in animals by the combination of dexamethasone, an established immunomodulator, with inotekine, a metalloproteinase inhibitor obtained from the hemocytes of Mytilus edulis. The effects of the combination were compared with dexamethasone alone and with inotekine alone. The combined treatment enhanced the proliferation of spleen cells from mice in response to concanavalin A (Con A), lipopolysaccharide (LPS), and alloantigens. In contrast, the Con A-induced interleukin-2 (IL-2) release was reduced, although the levels of IL-2 receptor expression remained unaltered. Concerning the humoral immune response, the combination of the two drugs enhanced the humoral immune response to sheep red blood cells (SRBC), although not significantly. To study the long-term effects of the combination of inotekine and dexamethasone, we employed a chronic feeding study in mice. The combination of the two drugs enhanced the long-term humoral immune response as determined by the IgM plaque-forming cell response and the IgM hemagglutination (HA) response, whereas the IgG plaque-forming cell and IgG HA responses remained unchanged. The percentage of splenic macrophages was also increased. To conclude, we present data that demonstrate that the combination of dexamethasone and inotekine shows enhanced immunomodulatory properties, including long-term effects. 1.
