The present invention relates generally to a system for separating and fractionating or isolating constituents from a particle-laden fluid. In many industrial processes, it is often necessary to separate particles from a fluid stream to produce a purified or otherwise suitable form of the fluid. In many fluid separation processes, such as a vapor-liquid-solid process or a chemical vapor deposition process, the particles can be highly concentrated and therefore require some type of rapid, efficient, separation in order to obtain a suitable yield of purified fluid. In many instances it is necessary to rapidly, yet efficiently, separate relatively large quantities of particles or solids from a fluid. Various particle separation techniques, such as centrifugation, have been employed in the past. The present invention is concerned with centrifugation techniques of the type which rely on the relative densities of the particles and the fluid, the density differential being due primarily to the difference in solubility of the particles in the fluid. Such techniques are generally more effective when the particles have a more uniform density than is
