Thanks Sren,
I changed the settings to use the preview in LR. Now it is not so noticeable to use it with the help, we were using a help panel for a long time.
I can't tell you why it is doing this but this is a side-effect of the internal workflow of adobe products as well as of Adobe Muse. In some cases it is also a problem when working with the Smart Previews. We are working on the performance of the previews to improve the case when working in the developer mode.
We hope to get some more comments now, regarding the performance is going to be great.
Regards,
Viveka Ok, I just tried it, and it does not work for me when working in the developer mode. I tried it on a Macbook Pro 2011 running 10.9 and also on a MacBook Pro 2012 with Mountain Lion. Both times I get the error message "Could not connect to the smart preview server. Please try again later." If you cannot connect, the smart preview server could not be reached."
Thanks.

Regards,
Sren Hi Sren,
My test data is 1500 NEFs taken with a D800 using Capture One as the backend. And it works fine for me, there is no error message when I start working. I am using a wired network, I could also reproduce this error message on a wireless network. I guess it is a problem when you can not get internet connection.

Regards,

Viveka SmartObject technology is great for helping you to choose which object or image you want, and it can be used to mark out parts of your picture that you don't want removed. For instance, if you use photos as a reference image to complete an illustration for a magazine, it might be a good idea to consider SmartObjects when working on the illustration. SmartObjects share a lot of things in common with Smart Guides, Smart Brushes, and the other choices you get from the Control panel in this application.

Next comes the browser. The power of a web browser is often under-appreciated, and designers often spend a lot of time creating and uploading documents in their web browser to work on in Photoshop. This is not only time consuming but costly with many designers including a lot of data in each and every image. With recently introduced features, the classic desktop version of Photoshop can now be opened within a browser, with the ability to drag a Photoshop document into one's own browser, and without the need to upload it. With the release of Photoshop for the web, designers can use a wider range of devices, including mobile, while sharing and collaborating on projects more quickly and effectively. The most recent additions to Photoshop Elements from Adobe, include deep learning ecosystem support and added AI capabilities, such as Smart Sharpen. These new features are enabled via the new Universal Lens SDK, which allows for faster, better and safer security features. The Universal Lens SDK allows developers to safely leverage deep learning and AI through a completely separate, decoupled photo management system, and enables the features you need without having to pull in any of the user's data. While this certification process opens up the broader developer community to deep learning, the SDK also offers secure image analysis features so it's easier for the user, and protects their image files.
