As the user browses the different panels in Photoshop, the Image Processor analyzes the various layer features and formats to calculate the changes in the image. It runs this analysis in the background when it's still reading the image, so you don't see it take up resources. With the new pipeline, however, the Image Processor is performing an additional layer-processing task, which is the scan-through analysis of all the layer changes. If the Analysis option is enabled, this additional step is run at least once per second on background worker threads, or as fast as the machine can run them. This is intended to be a very fast and lightweight operation, but it's also a user-visible step. The new-to-CS5 pipeline for layer processing is called the "Copy/Paste Layers Pipeline" and it was introduced in CC. This pipeline runs the check of the image for changes, and then makes a copy of the image before applying and updating the new layer mask. It then checks for changes in that new-copy image, and updates the original image by applying those new changes to the mask. It then compares the change image to the new-copy image, updates the image with the changes that aren't already present in the new-copy image, and updates the new-copy image with any changes that are. This pipeline is designed for the performance of images that have many changes, and it's enabled by default. Adobe claims that the new pipeline should be two to four times faster than CS4's. The details on how it's doing that vary by feature. In the layer masking case, the pipeline should process an image with over 5,000 layers in a second, which is often faster than the old CS4 system of some processing and re-processing layers.
