Lightroom now supports 32-bit RAW files, though it doesn't support the native RAW format known as DNG. The new release also allows you to sync Lightroom across multiple platforms and access and create collections on mobile devices. Okay, now while most people still use the standard JPEG format for images, it's no longer a necessary step: you can create and save lossless 8-bit TIFF and 12-bit extended raw images, as well as 14-bit TIFF images. RAW files offer a more flexible and high-quality format from which you can create better images. This is possible by aligning several new options in the new filter, which lets the software know what kind of image you are trying to create. While RAW file export makes use of Adobe's DNG format, it also supports all other RAW file formats, including CR2, CX, ORF, as well as Epson's DPP. It's understandable that Adobe wants to adopt the DNG format because it marks the Ebay standard and is more widely used than JPEG. By default, the output will have ICC color profiles, but you can enable or adjust the color profiles using the settings menu while you can adjust the individual and group tones using the tone curve adjustment. When you save a JPEG image, you can either save as a JFIF or EXIF format. A JFIF format is a JPEG image with only the image's data. It is compatible with most previewers, but iOS devices such as the iPhone, iPad, and iPod Touch will open JPG, not JFIF images. To save a JFIF format, you have to uncompress the JPEG with Lightroom or the QT lossless compression option.
