Photoshop will now import TIFF images using 8-bits per color channel as well as adding the ability to edit eight-bit images without the need for color conversion. TIFF images can now be imported directly into Photoshop without the need for conversion. The most significant addition includes the ability to edit 8-bit images without the need for color conversion. A new 8-bit import embeds the entire bit depth into the file header. This new import is optimized to handle the variety of color and grayscale, and even supports the most complex color spaces like Cyanotype true-color and Apollo true-color plus a new library and flexible color profile support. The new 8-bit import makes it easy to view and edit TIFF files, and can't be removed from Photoshop after import. Photoshop fully supports XMP metadata. XMP metadata is embedded into any image, allowing it to be used by commercial software products such as Lightroom or ACDSee. XMP comes from the Creative Labs XMP specification. It's highly extensible, and will be supported by new versions of most photo editing software that support XMP. Now Photoshop users can easily access a site's address, even if that address requires an Authentication Code to access. Additional enhancements include the ability to highlight all links on the page, and the option to paste a link from within the browser address bar. A new Droplist tool was added in CS5. It allows you to choose items from a list and drop them into the current document. You can also insert an existing Droplist. The Style Builder tool lets you create and edit styles for making web designs reusable while the Intelligent Object Selection tool enables you to quickly and easily select and group common objects.
