Overall, Lightroom 5 performance has been unchanged from version 4, and I found no bugs or problems specific to this version. Though it wasn't my first choice for a photography workflow tool, it's still leagues better than other applications I've tried. I'm disappointed that Adobe has neglected to include Apple's iOS 10's built-in adjustments time-lapse feature in the latest release. I find this feature to be an excellent way to create dramatic compositions, examples of which I will show in a later section of this review. One of the most welcome changes in Lightroom 5 is the decision to eliminate the rainbow-like filter strip across the bottom of the user interface. The ability to create a custom plugin by developing or downloading a setting is gone. Users also cannot apply filters or other settings without viewing the appropriate preset in the interface. Photoshop Express remains a useful choice for free-ranting picture sharing, though other apps are available for this purpose. I use the both as I need them. Lightroom 5 still allows users to create a Viewer add-on, though it is not publicly available. In my opinion, this is why Lightroom remains so popular among photographers. The ability to edit images in many different ways, some of which I've included here below, make it easier to learn as you go. Lightroom has a new Filter and Effects panel. This, I think, is the right place to not have the above mentioned Strip in it. Maybe we need a Filter Strip for it, so we can easily add those filters we use all the time to it. Or, at least, let us easily hide and show it and change its position in a better way.

With this release, Photoshop is also moving to a new workspace on the web, and these changes will be fully rolled out this year. The author of this blog, Thomas Nattestad, has worked on previous versions of the web version of Photoshop. He explains these changes and how Photoshop has been optimized for the web over the past few years. Over the last three years, Chrome has been working to empower web applications that want to push the boundaries of what's possible in the browser. One such web application has been Photoshop. The idea of running software as complex as Photoshop directly in the browser would have been hard to imagine just a few years ago. However, by using various new web technologies, Adobe has now brought a public beta of Photoshop to the web.
