The Energy For All report estimates that if a new Clean Development Mechanism is created, backed by the private sector, energy firms and governments can invest $7.7 trillion from now to 2030 to "improve energy efficiency, reduce emissions and curb rising electricity demand." The review adds to a growing body of evidence that governments can use carbon markets to make real, important change to the fight against climate change. Currently there are 17 such regional carbon markets worldwide, with over 50 signatories. India, Japan, Mexico, Singapore, Chile, Argentina and Norway have already signed up to the CDM, though only the United States has approved a new project in the last few months. It has also had a number of high-profile defections this year, including from China. On Wednesday, for example, China signaled its opposition to the proposal to add funding for CDM projects in India, where one of the largest steel companies has announced plans to build a massive 1.3 million tonne steel mill. The announcement from Tata said the plant would slash emissions by producing steel in a much more efficient way than in previous decades. The idea of the CDM was first developed by the late European Union Commissioner for Development Maurice Tobin, and over the next few years was adopted by the European Union, Russia and China. The first CDM project was built in 2001 in Thailand and is still going on, but the market is only now coming 0cc13bf012
