Field of the Invention The invention relates to an electric power steering apparatus for an automotive vehicle. 2. Description of the Related Art There is a known electric power steering apparatus for an automotive vehicle which includes an electric motor whose rotating shaft extends through a bearing housing which has a bearing formed therein, and which is operatively associated with a rack shaft which is attached to an input shaft of a steering wheel. An end portion of the electric motor is located within the bearing housing and is attached to a cylindrical surface of the bearing housing. The input shaft of the steering wheel is rotatably supported on the bearing housing. More specifically, the input shaft of the steering wheel is rotatably held in a spline fitting formed in an end portion of the bearing housing in a manner projecting outwardly. However, the input shaft of the steering wheel has an axial dimension larger than an axial dimension of the bearing housing. As a result, the bearing housing to which the end portion of the electric motor is mounted is spaced apart from the end portion of the input shaft of the steering wheel by a predetermined distance. In an electric power steering apparatus for an automotive vehicle, a motor control unit (MCU) is mounted on the bearing housing so as to control the operation of the electric motor. This bearing housing is contained within an engine compartment which is located at a relatively high position within the vehicle. Thus, a large space is required for a wiring harness which is connected to the MCU. Further, since the end portion
