Small birds frequently roost at night to be warmed and to obtain food from the ground on which they may roost. Thus, they are frequently in danger of not being able to return to their roost in the morning. This danger is increased by the fact that these birds cannot fly well at night, and hence it is often necessary to avoid all but the most attractive places to which they might roost during the night. Small birds, such as jays and crows, are also frequently found in large concentrations in areas of fresh growth, such as the edges of cities, and in such areas it may be difficult to keep them out of edible areas. Solutions to the problem of providing food for small birds at night include providing night feeding stations, such as described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,265,802. However, night feeding stations can be easily contaminated, as animals may eat foods which may be harmful to them. Also, birds in the vicinity of such stations may investigate them in the daytime, and could possibly
