"Having been there regularly with my dog, as well as jogging in the park, it's a nice respite from the city," says Lindsay Squires, who uses the park regularly while living on Parkhill Circle. "Seeing [a converted park] would be good; seeing it as a major city amenity would be even better." The Hudson Tract Initiative, a nonprofit community organization, says the conversion would include a protected bike lane, a passenger loading zone and a bridge connecting the Downtown West area to Martin Luther King Jr. Park. The board hopes the conversion, which was approved by the city last summer, would attract more patrons to the park and facilitate the transportation of goods throughout the city. "It's really not a very long project," says Hudson Tract Initiative board member Charlie Krepps. "It's going to be a small three- to four-lane tunnel underneath the park." The project involves reconfiguring the current eight lanes of traffic that run through the park to six lanes, which would be separated by concrete divider walls. During construction, the park would be closed to drivers. Krepps says when the project is complete, the park would be redone and traffic would be diverted away from the area. "The park would be redesigned," Krepps says. "There's not going to be any concessions to the [park] users. The goal is really to [redirect] cars off of the main area so we can have a safe environment for people
