A: It is to prevent code injection attacks (which should be considered malicious by default). Even though Apple claims that it's secure, they still need to protect against XSS. The security in iOS 8 goes way beyond the traditional XSS and code injection protection. To better defend against fraud and theft, every app is protected against malvertising. Malvertising is a type of phishing attack that compromises the security of an app on a user's device through an app or website. Malvertising (or malvertising) is a type of fraud that occurs when an attacker compromises a legitimate website and uses it to spread malware or malicious code to users. Malvertising works by taking advantage of legitimate websites that send out content. Malvertising is more of a network-level issue where attackers exploit networks rather than typical user-level issues like cross-site scripting (XSS). To mitigate the risk of malvertising, iOS automatically blocks malicious content when an app is opened on a device. If iOS detects that an app is downloading a suspicious file, it will automatically close the app. As a result, iOS helps apps avoid fraudulent, malicious and false content, without the burden of a developer having to implement specific protections for their apps. Apps that download content from the web or from other apps are automatically protected from malvertising attacks. In order to download a file, an app must connect to a website that the user has visited before. To verify the website's legitimacy, iOS checks that the website is on a whitelisted list. This list is provided by the App Store on Apple Developer Center and includes a number of valid websites, like Google and Apple. If the website is not on this list, it will reject the app. This is the simplest form of preventing malicious content. Apps that download content from non-whitelisted websites are also protected by iOS. To download content from a non-whitelisted site, the app must ask the user to verify the website with their Apple ID. Using this verification, iOS will protect the app against a malvertising attack in which a website is used to distribute malicious or fraudulent content. While this helps against rogue websites, it may also block content that an 6d1f23a050
