If you look at the posts on this blog, particularly in the last two years, you'll see that I've been critical of the way things are. To some degree, I've been more worried about what I see happening than what others see. But here's a recent example of what I mean: There are questions I have about whether the Jesus movement is dead or dying. But neither are actually true. To my mind, this statement is both false and implies a misguided sense of consensus among Jesus people. The great work of Jesus people is moving on toward Jesus and away from what is gone. The reason this is a big deal is because most of us consider ourselves to be Jesus people. More importantly, we tend to consider ourselves to be a significant segment of Jesus people. I think the recent experience of many people in Jesus movements is similar to the story of a person who loses a limb or an eye, and immediately understands that they are no longer the same person. We see our faith differently after a significant loss of part of who we are. We have lost a bit of who we were. Our past so far has been partial, and it has been a source of grief for many of us. Yet, we have been given the gift of being a spiritual people without a past; there is something new and different about us. We believe the same truth that once made us a part of Jesus' movement. We are true to the deepest desires of Jesus. This recognition should open the door to a vast frontier of experience where we can be ourselves, whatever that is. Jesus people come from many different circumstances. I think what we have seen is that within this broad variation, there is an emerging consensus about what Jesus calls us to be: true, truth-loving, seekers of justice, servants of the poor, and, perhaps most significantly, ordinary citizens. It is my sense that we will look
