Click here: zefiun.comStory highlights A small business set up by a woman that has no children is charged with sending out sex toys The U.S. Postal Service initially found the catalog offensive (CNN) A small business in California that sells sex toys is facing an outrageous lawsuit for its catalogs. When the business, called Peekaboo Sexual Pleasures, was founded by a woman who has no children in her home, a U.S. postal inspector found its catalogs offensive and said it was a violation of the law. Peekaboo says the catalogs are simply meant to educate women and provide entertainment, not focus on sex. The company also says it has no intention of encouraging anyone to purchase its products. The business is facing a $120,000 fine for each mailing of the catalogs to customers who subscribed. "It's like the United States Postal Service has taken over one of the most private and intimate parts of life -- sex -- and is now holding it hostage," the company's lawyer, Jim Rudick, told CNN. I'm slowly working my way through the.NET documentation and I've come across two pieces of documentation that seem to use essentially the same term to refer to something else. I can't seem to find a straight answer for what the difference between these two terms actually means. Here's what Microsoft uses it for: Set Hook for an event type Causes the method for the event to be invoked at the end of the current invocation cycle of the method. Only one method for the event can be registered per event. In
