The X-series also builds on the success of the GFX 50S and 50R in providing high quality and value. This is Fujifilm's attempt to add value to its successful GFX series, which takes it further into the boutique DSLR market. The X300 inherits its design and it looks similar, and some will see it as almost a spiritual successor to the F series, the cameras of which have been wildly popular and still remain popular today. The X300 shares the smooth and well-supported Fujifilm design language and the rounded corners that are used in some of their newer cameras. This newer design language has been used in their hybrid cameras as well, but seem to really benefit the global X-series. The X300 lineup still provides a full-frame sensor, while offering the same 7840 x 3648 (px) sensor size as the X6S. The X-series uses the 50S as its core, but offers higher resolution, faster readout speed, better low light capability due to the larger size of the sensor and added low light features. However, the X300 retains the macro features seen on the X100S, that was itself a good upgrade from the X100. The X300 also maintains much of the design of the other X-series cameras and it is unlikely to appear in a bag that looks like that of the GFX50S. It is a slightly more modest camera and the EVF gives a better viewing experience compared to the GFX50S. The X300 retains a rather large button cluster structure. The photographer is able to use the large button cluster system to operate the camera as well as a vertical interactive button. (Below are a few examples of Fujifilm's new design language).
